Political movements do not always move as intended. Ideologies collide, intentions fracture. In this talk, using ethnographic case studies, Tausig argues that sound, like political movements, often irrupts with the hope of transformation, before diffusing and distorting as it touches the world. The constrained mobility of movements is closely connected to the constrained mobility of sound.

Benjamin Tausig is Assistant Professor of Music. He is an ethnomusicologist studying sound, music, and protest. He has conducted fieldwork in Bangkok, Thailand, and written on cultures of sonic dissent globally. Tausig’s work has appeared in the journals Culture, Theory, & Critique, Twentieth-Century Music, and Positions: Asia Critique.