

Political Science

The politics of the 21st century are far more dynamic than at any other point in history. No longer do societies interact simply through governmental organizations; corporations, NGOs, non-profit charities and religious organizations have all entered the political game. A Political Science major has an in-depth understanding of today's political climate as well as an understanding of the tools and techniques used in formulating policy. Students of Political Science also possess superior communication ability, which is indispensable in today's rocky market, regardless of career or industry.

Transferable Skills

- Analytical and critical thinking abilities
- Research experience
- Extensive technical and analytical writing abilities
- Rhetorical skills
- Making projections
- Thinking logically
- Comparing and contrasting ideas and information
- Didactic skills
- Oratory skills
- Conflict resolution skills
- Worldliness/understanding of current events
- Conceptualizing and implementing projects
- Developing research designs and models
- Understanding components of complex problems

Career Communities to Consider

- Technology & Engineering
- Arts & Communications
- Education & Helping Professions
- Public Service