This course explores the lives of early modern women in the British Isles. Together we will investigate the lives of middle to lowering class women in Britain and how their contribution to society was viewed and consumed. In many cases they did not receive the same education to their male counterparts, however, most women were still expected to raise children, work, and manage household affairs. In the age of exploration thousands of men left Britain to try and create wealth for their families. While some did succeed, they often left their wives at home to govern their households and raise their children making women’s contribution to British society fundamental. This course emphasizes their contributions to the development of early modern Britain. The course is split into three sections. We will explore the lives of women in England, Scotland, and Ireland with each section having a quiz, writing assignment, and document review. There will be a final exam at the end of the course. The course material will be disseminated through lectures, supplementary videos, podcasts, and primary as well as secondary reading sources.
