HIS 542/CEG 535: Modern Latin America

Eric Zolov

Thursday, 5:45-8:40 PM, SBS N-318, On-Campus

This Field Seminar introduces students to central thematic areas of research and the key historiographical debates within those areas across Latin American history, with a particular focus on the modern era (c. 1830-1980s). It is designed for graduate-level students whose research or teaching focus is Latin American history, although students from other geographic concentrations and disciplines are also welcome. While not inclusive of all historical approaches, the course aims to introduce students to many of the most relevant historiographical discussions across as broad a temporal and geographic range as possible. Students will write several short papers and a longer final historiographic paper on a topic of their choosing, as well as to present on a set of readings. MA/Ph.D. students register for HIS 542, MAT students register for CEG 535.
