How did the theatrical practice of blackface help establish the geo-political domains of the British empire? Tracking the performance of blackface characters in plays such as Charles Dibdin’s The Padlock and Edward Young’s The Revenge, Wilson will demonstrate how colonial blackface performances were vital not only to embodied notions of ‘race’ that they commodified and conveyed, but also to the spatialization of the eighteenth century empire.